Other (Biographical Information):

I enlisted in the Marines a year before 9/11. Through two deployments, including the invasion of Iraq in 2003, I learned how to put service above self. In 2013, I joined the Alaska State Troopers. Work took me from Dillingham to Arctic Village and dozens of communities in between.

I've always cared deeply about public service and working across the aisle to get things done. On the Anchorage Assembly, I've focused on public safety, better infrastructure, and accountability in local government. Alaskans thrive through community, compassion, and hard work. It's time our leaders reflected these same values. That's why I'm running with JKT.

Position Statement

Alaska is at a crossroads. After nearly a decade of dysfunction in Juneau, we need leadership that's willing to work across the aisle to put Alaska first. Although I've never been a member of a political party, I've spent my career working with anyone who is serious about serving our country and our state.

During my time on the Anchorage Assembly, I've built consensus and worked with colleagues across the political spectrum. As Alaskans, there's more for us to agree on than to argue over: educating the next generation, protecting public safety, and restoring trust in state government. But we need leaders who value common sense and public service — not scoring political points or fighting culture wars.

As lieutenant governor, my priorities will be lowering everyday costs and standing up for public schools. These aren't ideological issues: they're the bedrock of making government work for Alaskan families.

Let's get Alaska back on track by:

- Lowering energy costs and making sure Alaskans get a fair share of our state's oil wealth.
- Defending Medicaid and ensuring all Alaskans can access high-quality healthcare, no matter where we live.
- Supporting public schools and getting cell phones out of classrooms.
- Reducing fisheries bycatch and restoring crashed salmon runs.
- Investing in ports, ferries, and bridges that power our economy.
- Creating long-term opportunities and good-paying jobs that help every community in Alaska thrive.

Alaska families deserve better. JKT and I are ready to get to work.
